

About the Seminar

In recent decades, regional history has emerged as a significant field within historiography, challenging grand national narratives by foregrounding local experiences, identities, and cultural specificities. Contemporary approaches emphasize subaltern perspectives, oral traditions, environmental contexts, gender relations, and interdisciplinary methodologies. Scholarly initiatives such as the Subaltern Studies Group have further expanded the scope of regional studies by highlighting marginalized voices and alternative sources. This seminar aims to critically examine the theoretical developments, methodological shifts, and emerging research areas in regional history. It seeks to provide an academic platform for meaningful dialogue among scholars, teachers, and students on the evolving dimensions and future directions of regional historiography.
